 Beloved: Well loved
Literary: To do with writing

Seam: Where the gold is in a mine

Inheritance: What the past leaves to the future

Three of Britain's most beloved children's authors have called for every school to have a library.

His borrowed materials

When Philip Pullman was at school, the library was where he went to find his dreams. These dreams helped him to write his classic fantasy series, His Dark Materials.

But now, he says, school libraries are under threat. So he's teaming up with other literary greats,

WHAT YOU NEED TO KNOW

Reading isn't just great fun. Scientists have found that the more people read for pleasure, the better they are likely to do at school. One study even found that readers tend to live about two years longer than non-readers.

including Michael Morpugo, and the Gruffalo author Julia Donaldson. Together they're spreading the word about what libraries can do for you.

They want to pass a law to ensure that every school has a library.

Libraries shelved

Sadly, the number of school libraries fell last year. More than one in six primary schools don't have a library at all! One survey last year found that more than half of children said that they did not enjoy reading for pleasure.

Buried treasure

Pullman spoke passionately about the need for schools to protect "the most important room in the entire school".

"The library should be the heart, the soul, the mind, the source, the spring, the gold-bearing seam, the engine room, the treasure chamber, the priceless inheritance, the joy and the pride of the school. Every school."
